EITHER—OB. aut—aut. vel—vel. sive (scu)—sive (scu).—Obs. 1) Aut is objective, and refers to a real difference in the things or notions themselves: vel is subjective, and relates to a difference between them as contemplated by the mind of the person who is speaking or acting about them; aut—aut therefore should be used when things are strongly opposed in their own nature, aut dives aut pauper; aut frigus aut calor; aut Cicero aut Pompeius, &c. Aut—aut should also be used in the sense of either, or at least [aut in omni, aut in magna parte vitæ. C. Tusc. 3, 17, 28]. Aut—aut may stand in interrogative and comparative sentences, and may follow negatives. (2) Vel—vel. In aut—aut the members necessarily exclude each other; in vel—vel they only exclude each other arbitrarily, according to the view of the speaker, and it is not implied that they might not possibly co-exist. Vel—vel sometimes approaches to the meaning of sive—sive; i. e. the speaker conceives the things as different indeed, but not essentially, so that it is immaterial which is taken: pace vel Quirini vel Romuli dixerim. The second vel may be strengthened by etiam, vero etiam, or omnino. (3) Sive—sive is the 'either—or' of indifference, the speaker leaving it undecided, in ignorance or any other motive, with name, supposition, &c., is the correct one; e. g. sive casu, sive consilio; sive felicitate quadam, sive bonitate naturæ, &c. In the best prose, vel in C. sive—sive is used; with the exception, however, of Cæsar, who has often seu—seu. In post-Aug. writers we have also sive—seu, or seu—sive. The second sive may be strengthened by etiam.—4) After negatives, the usual way of translating 'either—or' is by (neque)—neque; i. e. nemo unquam neque poeta neque orator fuit; nihil loci est neque segnitie neque socordie [see end of Obs. 1, on aut]. Not either—or, neque (neq)—neque (neq). E.—or even, aut—aut etiam, aut—aut vero (the second being the stronger supposition).—vel—vel etiam; vel etiam vero; vel omni no.—~~et~~ The aut or vel may be repeated three or more times. The first aut may also be omitted, just as in English; we must (either) conquer or die, hic (a ut) vincendum, aut moriendum milites.

EITHER (of the two), alteruter (either one or the other).—uter, uterque (misly 'which,' 'whichever' of the two, but ut = 'either,' e. g. si uter [orator et decurmanus] velit).—uterlibet, utris (either of the two indifferently).—utrum mavis (which of the two you choose). Nor did he wish to derive the state of e. army, neque rempublicam alteritro exercitu privare voluit: if any one had not been of e. side, si qui non alteriususque partis fui-set: take or choose e., utrumlibet elige or utrum horum mavis accipe: in e. way the consequence will be a great confusion, utroqueque modo summa sequetur confusio (Q. 3, 6, 29). I have less strength than e. of you, minus habeo virum, quam utervis vestrum: let e. abuse the other, uterque utrumque vituperato. Not—either, neuter; on either (= each) side, alterutrumque (Plin. 20, 7, 26).

EVERY, quisque, quæque, quilibet, and (used adjectively) quodque (every one that belongs to a certain number or whole; one as well as the other; hence 'all', but considered individually). — quilibet. quibet, with the two neut. forms quid- and quod-vis; quid- and quod-libet; the quid- forms used substantively; the quod- and fem. have but one form (e. one = 'any one you please'; but quivis is subjective, referring the choice to the person addressed; quilibet, objective, referring it to chance: any one that turns up, no matter who). — omnes, pl. (all); including therefore every individual composing the whole, but not considering them individually, but inclusively). — omnis (in sing. is also used for 'e.' with a singular substantive; it denotes that the substantive is to be taken as a whole, as the name of a class, so that what is said of it holds good of all the class; e. g. omnis de officio quæsto duplex est; this is true of every kind of discussion about points of morality; so omni officio satisfacere ci, i. e. by services of every kind). — Every single (one), unus quisque; unus quivis; unus quilibet, or quilibet unus (this addition of the unus strengthens the individualizing power of the pronouns; the distinctions, of course, remain the same). — Let e. man retain whatever he possesses, quod cuique obigit, id quisque teneat. *In the days of our ancestors the experienced were employed for this service. but now e. body, no matter who, apud majores adhibebatur peritus, nunc quilibet. Agesilaus non destitit, qui buscumque rebus posset, patriam juvare. Before e. thing, omnium primum; ante omnia. ¶ When 'every' refers to any numerical distribution, the distributive numerals are to be used; e. g. bina venationes per dies quinq;ue, i. e. two e. day for five days; so for e. day, month, year, singulis diebus, mensibus, annis, &c. EVERYBODY, quisque, unusquisque, quilibet, quivis (SYN. in EVERY). — omnes, cuncti (all, all together); also by an interrogation with quis est, qui &c. The f. point, caput ca rei. summus ca rei. cardo ca rei (on each all turns; F. and Q.).—momentum (point), the critical, decisive point. It was ever his f. case, ei semper maxima or antiquissima cura fuit: to make alth one's f. object, omne studium in q̄ re ponere. This is the f. point, hoc caput est; hoc maximum or primum est. To fall in love at f. sight, devenire or incidere in amorem aut aspectu (Auct. ad Her. 2, 30, 33). Nobody can fall in love at f. sight, nemo potest uno aspectu neque præteritis in amorem devenire (ib.). For 'in the first place,' see FIRST, adv.—(1825) The three f., tres primi (e.g. tribus primis diebus, Cæc. B. C. 1, 18, wh. may help to banish the foolish notion that accuracy requires us to say 'the first three'). He considered that the f. thing was, &c., nihil prius faciendum putavit.—(1825) The Latins regarded as an opposition the closer distinction, wh. in English is expressed by a rel. proposition, or by an infn. I was the f. who did it, or, the f. to do it, primus feci. If only two are spoken of, the f. is prior, opp. to the second, posterior; or, if there be a ref. to two subjects already named, ille (the second being expressed by hic). If f. = earliest, ultimus is used; ab ultimâ origine: the f. (= next) oft ab. proximus. If the f. thing, = the most important thing, summum or caput is used; e.g. the f. step towards a happy life is, caput est ad bene vivendum; he considered that the f. thing should be, nihil prius faciendum putavit. To be the f. in alth, initium ca rei facere, capere, ducere (to do it f., to make a beginning); principem ease in re; optimum, præstantissimum esse in q̄ genere; ca rei principatum obtinere (to be the most excellent); let us be neither f. nor last, nec duces simus, nec agmen claudamus: each wishing to be the f. (on the road), quum sibi quisque primum itineris locum peteret: to be the f. of his class, classem ducere (Q. 1, 2, 28): to be the f. aft. the king, secundum imperii gradum tenere: I am the f. (to get up) in the morning, and the last at night (in going to bed), primus cubitu surgo, postremum cubitum eo.*

FIRST, adv. I At first, primo (the general distinction between primo and primum is, that primo relates to time, primum to the order of occurrence; so that primo = 'at first,' implying that a change took place afterwards, primum = 'first,' when followed by what was done afterwards, in the second, third, last place, &c. Though this distinction is not universal, it should be observed by Lat. writers with this exception, according to Zumpt and Hand. vol. iv. p. 558 [agit Haase], that when deinde or postea follows, C. usually places primum for 'at first'.—princípio (et inc. beginning, originally; jus augurum divinationis opinione principio constitutum est; postea &c. C.).—initio (at the outset; redeo ad illud quod initio scripsi).—(1825) primo may be followed by post, postea, deinde, inde, dehinc, tum, postremo, ad extremum, tandem, mox, nunc, jam (Hand. iv. p. 558; Curt. has primo—ad jam). I Before all others, primum (deinde, the f., opp. postremo).—prior (adj., the f. or foremost of two, opp. posterior).—in primis (before all others, f.).—(1825) It would be incorrect, in this sense, to say primo: he must get up f., and go to bed last, primus cubitu surgat, postremum cubitum eat: whichever party f. occupied this pass, would have no trouble in keeping off the enemy, qui prior has angustias occupaverit, ab hoc hostem prohiberi nihil esse negotii: he f., or f. of all, put Adherbal to death, then the rest, in primis Adherbalem necat, dein omnes.

To vote for athq (e.g. at an election, &c.), suffragio suo ornare qm; suffragio suo adjuvare qm in petendis honoribus; suffragari ci ad munus (see Plin. Ep. 2, 1, 8; 8, 23, 2; *C. et qd: we are not preparing ourselves for the school, but for life, non scholæ, sed vitæ discimus: for the public or general welfare, omnium salutis causâ. || Towards, in. adversus (both with acc., in a friendly as well as a hostile sense).—erga (in a friendly sense only: e. g. love for aby, amor in erga qm). || In many instances, however, an oblique case is sufficient to express 'for': e. g. a remedy for fear, remedium timoris (or timori); love for aby, amor cs; care for you, vestri cura: an oblique case must not, however, be used unless where it is quite free from ambiguity: an oblique case (only the dative) will also suffice aff. certain adjectives: e. g. after 'fil', 'conveniens', &c.; but also the gen., it is used instead: e. g. anxious for athg, studiosus cs rei. So after 'it is becoming' or 'unbecoming' for aby, decet or dedecet qm. || In proportion, according to, pro (different both from secundum, which denotes accordance, and from ex, which implies causality): for my part, pro mea parte (i. e. according to the measure of my strength; see equidem has been generally explained 'I for my part'; but Hand shows that this force does not belong to it, but that of an affirmative particle, the affirmation referring to the speaker. Since, however, 'I for my part' is often little more than this, affirming that the speaker will do so and so, whether others do or not, 'I for my part' is often sufficiently translated by equidem): every one for himself, pro sua quisque parte: for so great a victory there was but little bloodshed, minor clades quam pro tantâ victoriâ fuit: they are very few for the number of the well-disposed, pro multitudine bene sentientium admodum pauci: they thought that, for their numbers and their military glory, their territory was too confined, pro multitudine hominum et pro gloriâ belli angustos se fines habere arbitrabantur (Cæ.). Another Crcl. by which this proportional 'for' is translated is with ut, where 'esse' or 'expectari poterat' must be supplied: e. g. he was learned for those times, erat, ut temporibus illis (sc. esse poterat) eruditus. So: a rich man for those times, ut tum erant tempora, dives: an eloquent man for a Theban, satis exercitatus in dicendo, ut Thebanus scilicet (Np). || Denoting purpose, its by the gerundive, or by the gerund in the gen. with 'causâ' or by the acc. with ad: e. g. Antigonus delivered up the corpse of Eumenes to his friends for interment, Antigonus Eumeneum mortuum propinquis ejus sepeliendum tradidit: for the purpose of foraging, pabulandi causâ (e. g. tres legiones mittere): for the purpose of laying Cæliberia waste, ad depopulandum Cæliberiam. By later writers the participle fut. act. is used in similar cases after verbs denoting or implying motion. To do athg f. the purpose of &c., facere qd eo consilio, ut &c. 'For' may also be translated by the supine: for the purpose of imploring, &c., (veniunt) rogatum, &c.; and by ut or quod with subj. || Denoting duration of time: e. g. for ten days, per decem dies. It may also be rendered by the acc. but with this difference, that 'per' points out more exactly the uninterrupted duration of time; and by inter of what has or has not occurred within a space of past time. Germani inter quatuordecim dies tecum non subierunt (Cæ.): to give aby a pension for life, qm annua, dum vivit, præbitis sustentare: for a short time, paulisper; ad tempus (only for a while).—perumper (for a short while): for a few days, in paucos dies: they have water on board for forty-five days, aqua dierum quinque et quadraginta in nave est: for ever, in omne tempus: in perpetuum; perpetuo (Ter. Tusc. 3, 2, 4), or nullamne hunc morbo medicinam facere potes? || Denoting the use to which athg is to be put: to be good for athg, ad qd or ci rei utile esse; usui esse: for nothing, ad nullam rem utilis: fit for athg; see FIT. || Because, by reason of, on account of (denoting cause): for fear, metu; propter timorem; metu coactus, permotus: for this reason, propter hanc causam; eo eam causam: for certain reasons, certis de causis: to like aby for his sweet disposition, qm pro ejus suavitatis amore: for good reasons, justis de causis: to have good reasons for athg, cum causâ qd facere: non siue gravi causâ qd facere: for that reason, eâ de causâ; ob or propter eam causam: for more than one reason, aliquot de causis: to be praised for athg, cs rei nomine laudari: for your sake, tuâ causâ: for the sake of age and honour, ætatis atque honoris gratiâ: to entreat aby for heaven's sake, qm per deos orare or obtestari (S.). || As: to take for granted, sumere or habere or putare pro certo: pro explorato habere: you have taken for granted that the Gods are blessed, deos beatos esse suspicasti: it is taken for granted by the philosophers, inter omnes philosophos constat: to know athg for certain, rem exploratam habere; qd certe or pro certo scire; qd certis auctoribus compariase: I know for certain, certum scio; certo scio: certo comperi; certum or pro certo habeo: to take (aby or athg) for a model, qm sibi imitandum proponere; proponere sibi qm ad imitandum; qm exemplum sibi deligere; also imitari only; qd ad imitandum proponere; qd in exemplum assumere. || For (in negative sentences) denoting a preventive cause: you will not be able to see the sun for the multitude of their darts, solem pro jaculorum multitudine non videbitis (L.): the decree could not be heard for the clamour, decretum exaudiri pro strepitu et clamore non potuit.—(see) præ must not be used of a

'For' often stands before the subject of an infn., and must be omitted in translation; e.g. it is right for children to obey their parents, rectum est, decet, oportet, &c., liberis parentibus obedire. It is often a sign of the dative. It is impossible for me, hoc facere, emere non possum: it is impossible for me to &c., fieri non potest, ut &c., or nequeo with infinit.]; e.g. it is impossible for a king to live like a private person, necesse rei vivere privatus: for instance, or example, verbi or exempli causa; or gratia; et alvel (SYN. FOH, conj. (alleging a reason or cause); m.m. namque enlm. etenim (with this difference, that 'nam' introduces the subsequent sentence, as explicative of the preceding one; the statement contained in the latter being defined by certain reasons alleged. The sentence joined by 'nam' appears only as an appendix, as it were, to the preceding one; hence 'namque': both, as a general rule, stand at the beginning of the sentence: 'enim' is used if the subsequent sentence is necessary to render the preceding one intelligible, or establish the proof of whatever has been advanced in it: in this latter case the reason alleged is as important as the assertion itself: the copulative 'et' is used to show the connexion; and hence 'etenim', which precedes the a member for the purpose signifying prominence to the reason contained in it: whereas 'enim', if standing by itself, is always inserted somewhere into the sentence; comp. Zumpt, § 343). etenim and enim both sometimes assert what the speaker wishes to be taken for granted; etenim is also used in explanatory parentheses, and in questions, in which enim also used; but etenim (= et quum ita res sit, quumso) makes the connexion more distinct; Pr. Intr. II. 791]. For—quod, neque enim (but non enim is not so uncommon in C. as is supposed; Pr. Intr. II. 789): since, etenim, quoniam: for if, etenim si (ib. 791): for—neque, neque unquam. For nothing is, nihil est enim (Koe in a sentence with est beginning with the predicate, or non, num, nemo, nihil, quis, or if est is emphatic, est my takes the second, enim the third place; Pr. Intr. II. 112). — Because, quum, quia. quod, quoniam. quandoquidem (implying also a reason, with this difference, that 'quum' alleges a simple reason merely, our 'since': 'quia' and 'quod', of which the former is the stronger, allege a reason founded on necessity, our 'because': 'quoniam' alleges a reason deduced fm the accidental occurrence of circumstances, our 'whereas': 'quandoquidem' gives a reason inferred fm some preceding circumstance). — quidem (= 'since it is admitted, implies something known and granted; see Zumpt, § 346). — Because, quod on the manner of translating 'for' = 'because', in the end. recentis panis est coquid: what good should I get by telling you a lie? quid mihi sit boni, si mentiar (Com.) I easily got, parabilia: this may be got for asking, or without the slightest trouble, hæc virgula divina, ut alunt, sappeditantur (C. Off. 1, 44, 158, proverbially): to get as answer, responsum ferre or auferre: to my letter fm aby, mei literis respondetur or rescribitur a qo: to get a situation, office, munus ei mandatur, deferitur; muneris præfector: to get athg out of one's head, memoriam as rei ex animo eijcere (purposely). See TO INDUCE. TO get athg done, qd faciendum curare, qd ei curandum tradere (to give it another person to manage, &c.); but, as in English, a person is often said 'to do what he really gets done' for him by another; e. g. wishing to get a ring made, quum vellet anulum sibi facere (C. Ferr. 4, 25, 66): to get athg carried to the army by ships, qd exercitui navibus supportare (Cæs. B. C. 3, 44). TO have got to do, &c. (= to have that task, &c.), by partec. in dus: I have got many letters to write, multæ mihi epistolæ scribendæ sunt.—GET 'to have got' [= to have] a book, &c., is objected to by Webster and other writers as a vulgarism; but it is not only thoroughly idiomatical, but may be easily justified. 'To get' being 'to acquire' (recipere, obtinere, &c.); 'to have got' is 'to have acquired' (recepit, obtinuit), and so 'to have,' 'to possess'; and it so happens that the river word has the same peculiarity in Greek, κτ-δουαι. 'I get' [where the radicals κτ- correspond to gt, the smooth mute κ having passed, according to Grimm's law, into the middle mute g]; κτ-δουαι, 'I have got' = 'I have' or 'possess.' Webster also objects to 'I could not get the work done,' as not elegant. It is to be hoped that the time for sacrificing our old idioms to modern and sickly notions of elegance is pretty nearly gone by.—For other combinations, e. g. to get aby's CONSENT, &c., see the subett.

under one, ei praesae or praepositum esse: to h. the enemy before one, e regione hostis (hostium) esse or stare: to long to h. alth, egere qd re: to h. a disease, morbo corruptum esse: but, to h. a fever, febrem or febrim (or dim.) febriculam habere (C.): to h. no fever, febrem non habere; febrim caere: a febre liberari (if the person has had it). ~~2~~ 'To have,' with sublt., esp. with abstract sublt., is often expressed in Lat. by v-ns containing the notion of such sublt.; as, to h. pleasure or delight in alth, gaudere or delectari qd re: to h. leisure for alth, vacare ei r. i (see the particular sublt. with which 'have' is used). Not to h., carere qd re: to h. enough, nihil ultra flagitare: no longer to h. a parent, parentibus orbem or orbatum or privatum esse: he has enough to live upon, habet qui or unde utatur: alth has something in it, non temere sit; est qd in re momenti; ei rei subest qd (e. g. a report has something in it).

Hence, 'to have,' in a wider acceptation, a) e. g., to h. received: now you h. my plans, habes consilia nostra: you h. it now, hem tibi qd h. this for your time-serving, hunc fructum refers ex isto tuo utriusque studio. b) To have heard, to know; e. g., to h. alth on good authority, qd certo auctore or certis auctoribus cognovisse: I h. the information from your brother, hoc accipi a fratre tuo; hoc audivi de fratre tuo. c) To get, to take, to receive, accipere (of what you deliver over): there you h. the book, accipe librum (as H. Sat. 1, 4, 14, accipe tabulas): here you h. two hundred quires (of paper), tu vero aufer auctores scapos (C. Att. 5, 4, 4): therefore you h. it! utre, accipe! (as Plaut. Mil. 3, 1, 176): new bread may always be had here, semper hic recentis panis est copia: that can easily be had, parabilia. d) to wish or desire to h., i. e. to demand, request, order, wish, desire; e. g. what would you h.? quid vis? quid postulas? I what would you h. with me? quid est, quod me velis? I would h. you do so and so, tu velim facias &c.

2) To hold in the hand, to carry or wear on oneself, habere, tenere (to hold), gestare (to carry, bear, wear): to h. in one's hands, (in) manibus habere or tenere: to h. in the hand (to lend), manu ducere: to h. about, secum habere or portare or gestare: esse cum qd re (e. g. cum teo): to h. something perpetually in one's mouth: to be continually mentioning it, qd semper in ore habere.

3) In connexion with the infin., in various relations. a) The infin. aft. 'I have,' is often equivalent to a relative clause; e. g., 'I have nothing to accuse old age of,' = 'I have nothing, of which I may accuse old age,' nihil (or non) habeo, quod incuam senectutem; nihil habeo, quod ad te scribam: I h. nothing to write, non habeo, quod scribam (but in non habeo, quid scribam, habeo would = scio, cognitum or perspectum habeo, I do not know what to write; see Beir. C. Off. 2, 2, 7; Krüger, 615, Obs. 6): this is what I had to say, haec habui, quod dicerem (not haec habui dicere, which is a Grecism): he has nothing to accuse us of, non est, cur nos incuset. b) The infin. aft. 'to have,' is its equivalent to an expression of duty, or rather denotes a task. Here it must be rendered by the partic. of the future passive; as, every one has to employ his own judgement, suo cuique iudicio utentem est: I h. many letters to write, multae litterae mihi scribendae sunt. In this construction, in the consequence of a conditional proposition, 'I would have,' &c. fuit is more common than fuisset; e. g. if you had lived, you would h. had to undergo alth, si vixisses, qd tibi subeundum fuit. I had to have a thing done, = to get it done, is to be translated by curare, to procure, in dus. I had him honorably buried, funus ei satis amplum faciendum curavi. But ~~2~~ a person is, as in English, oft. said to do what he really gets done for him: I will h. you put to death, interficiam te; wishing to h. a ring made, quum vellet annulum sibi facere. | Have = have caught (collog.): I h. you (there) teneo te! or hic te teneo (collog.): e. g. teneo te, inquam, nam &c. C. Acad. 2, 48, 148; hic te, inquit, teneo; non est istud iudicium pati; C. Quinct. 10, 63). | In answers, 'I have' is really equivalent to the perfect def. of the verb asking the question: 'thus have you conquered?' 'I have' = 'I have conquered,' vici. If the question is 'have you got it?' = 'do you possess it?' the answer will be in the present: h. you got it? teneas? I h., teneo.

HE, is implied in Lat. by the form of the verb, and in most cases sufficiently so. But if a particular emphasis is to be laid on it, it is usual to employ the demonstrative pronoun ille, or, with ref. to a third party, iste; and if he is = he himself, the master, &c., it is rendered by ipse (see Ruhnck. Ter. And. 2, 2, 23); e. g. they say that the Pythagoreans used to answer, 'he hath said it,' Pythagoreos ferunt respondere solitos, ipse dixit. The pronoun is also expressed when two actions of the same person are contrasted. It is used (1) if a person spoken of by name before (e. g. Polemarchus est Murgentinus, vir bonus atque honestus. Is quum

&c.); and (2) as the simple unemphatic antecedent to qui; he who, is qui (often, qui only: and in general propositions, si quis). What has been just said, refers only to 'he' in the nominative; for the other cases a demonstrative pronoun must be used, except where it is sufficiently implied by the context. — Also for 'he,' 'him,' &c., when = a person, the Latinus use homo; as, do you know him? nosti hominem? I love him very much, valde hominem diligo. In the acc. with infn. 'he' must be translated by se ('that' being omitted). In oblique narration (to wch the construction of acc. with infn. belongs, when the principal verb and the infn. have the same subject), 'him,' &c., is translated by sui, sibi, se, when the person so designated is the nom. of the principal sentence: by ipse for the nom., and where the use of the reflexive would occasion an ambiguity: e. g. putat hoc sibi nocere Gajus contemnebat divitias, quod se felicem reddere non possent. Sts there are also persons spoken of, and others spoken to. These must be denoted by is, hic, ille. Legationis Ariovistus respondit; si quid ipsi a Cæsare opus esset, esse ad eum venturum fuisse; si quid illi se velit, illum ad se venire oportere (here the speaker, Ariovistus, uses ipse and sui of himself; and having first named Cæsar, the person spoken of, he afterwards designates him by is and ille). So, too, if he had spoken to Cæsar, the direct, si quid mihi a te opus esset would become si quid sibi (or ipsi) a Cæsare (or ab eo, ab illo) opus esset, &c. But even of the speaker himself, the demonstr. 'is' is its found; Socrates respondit, esse meulise . . . ut el victus quotidianus in Prytaneo publice præberetur (C. Or. 1, 54). See His.

HEAD, v. primum locum obtinere (g. t., to stand at the h. of athg). — In primâ acie versari. primam aciem obtinere (to be placed in the first rank of an army). — exercitui præesse (to command an army). — principem cs rei esse. principatum cs rei tenere. principem cs rei locum obtinere (to be the first in it). — caput cs rei esse (to be the head of it). To h. an embassy, principem legatorum esse; principem legationis locum obtinere; a party, principem factionis esse; principatum factionis tenere; a conspiracy, principem or caput conjunctionis esse: to offer to h. athg, duces se offerre or se addere: to h. a party or cause, causæ cs duces et quasi signiferum esse.
